SHAKSPSAR.

TOWARDS the close of a beautiful evening, in the autumn of 1343, as Count Isenburgh, with his friend Sigifmund Mansfeldt, were returning from a ride through an extensive forest near

VOL I-B

Colditz, their attention was fuddenly arrested by the appearance of a very young and beautiful female figure, in vilible agitation, and at a short distance.

At the same instant, uttering an exclamation of surprise, they instinctively hurried towards the spot; but, before they could address the object that attracted them, she, in the most emphatic manner, intreated their protection.

"I am (added she) the most forlorn, and unfortunate creature in existence! berest of my only friend, and even ignorant where I now am, and whither my steps carry me. I have travelled in this frightful wood since eight o'clock in the morning; and, though happily escaping danger, have been tortured by every terrific sear that can shock the imagination! my strength now fails; if you refuse me succour and protection, I must inevitably die."

"You may command our fervices, (eagerly interrupted Sigifmund,) speak but your wishes: you appear finking with fatigue; allow me to place you on my horse, and I will conduct you to the place of your destination, however distant!"

"My castle is scarce a league from hence, (cried Henburgh,) let us, for the present, at any rate, hasten thither." "Oh! let me conjure you to conduct me to Leipfic!" (replied the stranger.) "Impossible! (returned Isenburgh) Leipfic is above fix leagues from this place. It would be madness to attempt to reach it to night! Be affured you are with those upon whose honour you may rely, and who will protect you from all danger. Be advised then, and accept the shelter of my castle."

Further entreaty was unnecessary; the young stranger had fallen, to appearance lifeless, upon the arm of Sigismund, just as Isenburgh ceased speaking.

Mutually alarmed, they confulted for a few minutes in what manner they should act. Is I fenburgh strongly urged haftening immediately to his castle; but Sigismund trembled, lest carrying her a league, in a state of infenfibility, might produce fatal confequences; when Ifenburgh fortunately perceived a stream at a very short diftance, to which he instantly hurried, and bringing fome water in his cap, plentifully sprinkled the face of the stranger, who, in a short time, gave figns of returning life, which was joyfully perceived by Isenburgh and Sigusmund; and, placing her upon the horse of the latter, they hastily took the road to the castle.

Upon their arrival, Isenburgh summoned the principal of his semale domestics, and, to their charge giving the yet half-fainting stranger, repaired, with Sigifmund to the library, where the became the fole fubject of their difcourte and wonder,

CHAP. II.

The friendships of the world are oft Confederacies in vice, or leagues of pleasure.

ADDISON.

COUNT Isenburgh was just nineteen years old, of distinguished birth, and large fortune, perfectly handsome, and genteel; and uncontrouled master of his actions.

Left an orphan in early infancy, and placed under the guardianship of a gentleman of extreme good nature, but moderate abilities, who, while he loved him as an engaging child, reverenced him as his fuperior. Young Isenburgh grew daily more arrogant, prefuming, and felf-willed; and the good dispositions with which nature had endowed him, were blasted by excessive and perpetual indulgence.

Yet, to a superficial observer, Isenburgh still was amiable and attractive; perfectly well educated as to exterior manners, and naturally good-tempered: he was often agreeable society; nor had fortune's savors and flattery spoiled him beyond retrieval.

But his temper was violent; and the smallest shadow of contradiction exafperated him to the utmost extreme of passion.

His acquaintance with Sigifmund commenced at Leipfic, where they had each received their education; and, though of very opposite dispositions, a degree of intimacy had succeeded.

Mild, amiable and fincere, Sigifmund attracted universal regard; his reason was beyond his age, and he possessed very superior talents.

Baron Mansfeldt, his father, though fond of his fon, of whom the most careless parent might have been proud, not unfrequently treated him with austerity, and generally with coldness. The Baroness, (who was one of the most amiable of women,) though repining at this conduct, could not reverse it: and, though idolizing Sigisfmund with the extreme warmth of maternal affection, was unable to procure him the indulgencies her ardent tenderness defired.

The Baron was penurious, though wealthy; and to the friendship of Isenburgh, Sigismund was often indebted, for being extricated from many embarrassments into which he was involved through the partimonious spirit of his father.

Attached both by nature and gratitude to his mother, who had ever performed, in the fullest extent, the important duties of that character; Sigifmund was chiefly at the castle where she resided, and it was merely to oblige Isenburgh that he had confented to pass the shooting season with him at his estate near Colditz, where they had only arrived three days when the adventure occurred mentioned in the last chapter.

ROWE.

THE following morning Isenburgh had the pleasure to hear from his fervants, that the stranger seemed infinitely more composed; and had sent a request, to see both himself and Sigismund, for a sew minutes.

Both gentlemen eagerly obeyed the fummons, and hastened to the apartment in which was the lady, whom, if they had thought beautiful the preceding evening, when overpowered with terror and fatigue, they now thought angelic!

She appeared scarce sisteen, slender, and elegantly formed; and the harmony of her features, and inimitably turned countenance, were rendered yet more fascinating by the uncommon brilliancy of her complexion.

Her dark brown hair, which was redundantly luxuriant, was braided round her head in the Grecian manner: her drefs, was a loofe drapery of white muslin; and from a gold chain that hung round her neck, was fuspended a large enamelled heart, richly set round with diamonds.

Upon the entrance of Isenburgh and Sigismund, she rose hastily from her seat, and advancing towards them, energetically exclaimed:

"My generous prefervers! in what words can I express my gratitude and thanks! from what imminent perils have you faved me!—oh, gracious heaven! I yet shudder at the dangers I have escaped! language is too weak; and my heart too full, to allow me speech to express my feelings; but, may that same Power which, in pity to my distress, sent you to my aid, shower eternal blessings upon you!"

- "You value the trifling fervice we were so happy as to shew you too highly, (replied Isenburgh.) To have relieved your distress, I shall ever consider as the most valued moment of my existence! May I slatter mysels, that, in suture, you will condescend to look upon me as your most zealous friend; and, happily one, who has the ability, as well as the will, to serve you."
- "Alas, (answered the lady, burshing into tears,) it is impossible for any mortal to befriend me! my forrows cannot be alleviated!"
- "Might we but ask to be made acquainted with those afflictions, (cried Sigismund,) we might be able, at any rate, to soften them."

"I ought not to have any referves with such generous striends as I have found you, gentlemen; (returned the lady,) nor is it necessary. My name is Estella, but who, and what my parents are, I am totally ignorant. As long as I can recollect, I have lived in a small cottage, situated in a very retired part of the forest in which you found me, and concealed from common observation by thick and losty trees.

"Madame Veldentz, the only perion who lived with me, called herfelf my governess; and, to my frequent enquiries of who I was, and if I might ever hope to see my parents? always replied, that she was bound by the most solemn oaths, never to divulge the secret; but that the day would, perhaps, arrive, when I should know my family history; and that, in the mean time, I must attend unceasingly to the instructions she bestowed, as if the time should ever come that I should be introduced into the world, it would be necessary that I should be accomplished and well-informed; and if I remained in solitude, my acquirements would be a never-failing resource against weariness.

"To the extent of my abilities, I profited by her inftructions; and the custom of learning grew habitually so pleasing to me, that though we generally rose at six o'clock, music, drawing, reading and needle-work, (occasionally diversifying the time with walks near to our little dwelling,) so engroffed me, that the day generally seemed too short for our avocations.

" Madame Veldentz, who was an excellent manager, contrived, by keeping poultry, and cultivating our little garden, to have fo few wants, that there was feldom occasion for her vifiting Colditz; but fometimes that step was necessary, and her custom was then to go with the first dawn of morning, and leave me in our cottage, which she carefully locked and padlocked. Often did I fruitlessly urge her to permit me to accompany her, She was always deaf to my intreaties till about two months ago, when I attained my fifteenth year; then, overpowered by my repeated folicitations, the confented that I should attend her the following morning. What was my delight at obtaining this permission! I had never seen any habitation but our own, nor any human being but Madame Veldentz, (a sew working people excepted, who I but rarely had seen in the forest;) but I had read wonderful accounts of towns, cities, and mankind in general; and my heart stuttered with expectation and delight at the wonders I should behold!

Madame Veldentz, even when the morning arrived, seemed reluctant that I should accompany her; but my intreaties were too powerful for her goodnature to withstand; and enveloping me in a thick veil, we left our cottage, and took the road to Colditz.

- " We had fcarce proceeded half a league, when a man, wrapped up in a large great coat, fuddenly overtook us; and, making a full ftop, earneflly furveyed us. The countenance of Madame Veldentz fuddenly became overclouded, but whifpering to me to keep my veil carefully over my face, we continued to walk on a few hundred yards, when my governess, protesting the was feized with a violent cramp, infifted upon returning; and, though mortified at my disappointment, I could no longer oppose her resolution.
- "Upon our arrival at our cottage, Madame Veldentz feemed gloomy and unhappy; and when I expressed my chagrin at the failure of my wishes in the morning, pettifully chid me; and, upon my adding, that I hoped the next time she visited Colditz, I should be more fortunate, she harshly declared, no perfuasions should again induce her to allow me to bear her company.

- "Though vexed at this declaration. I did not dare repine; but flattered myself time might relax what I thought the severity of my governess.
- "A few mornings after this adventure, whilft walking in our little garden alone, I perceived, at a very thort diffance, the fame man who had met us in the forest.
- "Alarmed at his appearance, though from what cause, I could not assign,

I hurried in doors, and haftening to Madame Veldentz, informed her of his appearance.

- " Madame Veldentz turned pale at my information, and feemed for fome minutes deliberating how to act; then turning to me, the faid fternly;
- "Estella, it is necessary I should speak with this person who has thus alarmed you; but observe, remain in this chamber till my return.
- "So faying, the hastily quitted me; and I heard her, after cloting the door, carefully lock it.
- "Surprised at a conduct for which I could by no means account, I ran eagerly to the window, hoping from thence to be able to observe her conduct to the stranger.

- "I was not disappointed; I saw Madame Veldentz walk briskly to the spot where stood the unknown, who, upon seeing ber, hastened instantly towards her: he seized her hand; she did not remove it, and their conversation seemed equally interesting.
- "At length they fat down upon the body of a tree that lay upon the ground adjacent; and, for above three hours, feemed absorbed in an interesting conversation.
- "At last they arose, and, seeming to bid each other farewell, the unknown immerged deeper into the wood, and Madame Veldentz returned to our cottage.

- "During that whole day, she seemed full of reslection, and to my repeated interrogations, respecting the strange gentleman, replied, that the time would come when I should know every thing, but that for the present I must forbear curiosity.
- "Just as I had taken leave of her for the night, and was preparing to go to bed, she suddenly informed me, she must visit Colditz on the next day, but forbade me, on pain of her displeasure, to ask to accompany her.
- " I obeyed, though reluctantly, and went to bed; but fleep was a stranger to my eye lids; the mysterious conduct of my governess, the unaccountable appearance of the flranger, altogether bewildered my ideas, and I paffed the whole night in a fea of wonder and doubt, and arofe in the morning. with even increased alarm and apprebenfion.

" In fpite of my endeavours to conquer the notion, I could not perfuade med if but that Madame Veldentz was your to quit me for ever; and the idea was fo fixed upon me, that I actually acquainted her with my furnicions, and clinging to her, as the rote to depart, befought her for pity's fake not to abandon me!

- " Madame Veldentz feemed really shocked at my concern; yet, half chiding, half foothing, in some part relieved my sears, and endeavoured to convince me of their fallacy.
- "But when at the expiration of half an hour she arose, to depart, my terrors returned with additional violence, nor could I be pacified, till she faithfully promised to relinquish the idea of visiting Colditz that day,
- "Satisfied at having obtained this promife, I commenced my customary employments, and when night came, tenderly carreffed Madame Veldentz, thanked her for having humoured my weakness, and promised, never again to act so unreasonably.

- "Indeed, in that very flort space of time, my fears had lulled to rest, and I blushed at having for a moment indulged them.
- " My governess seemed much affected by my behaviour; her tears slowed, and her agitation was excessive.
- " At last, after bidding me a tender adicu, and making me swallow a cordial, which she said would be serviceable, she retired.
- "The following morning I flept longer than usual, in confequence, I imagined, of the medicine I had taken the preceding night.

- " I rose and hastened to the room where we usually breakfasted, in full expectation of feeing Madame Veldentz, but the room feemed defolate and fortaken; I again returned up flairs, and called upon the name of my governess repeatedly, but was still unfuccefsful. Half frightened, I haftened to the garden door, thinking it might be probable she was walking in the garden; alas, my fears then increased to an alarming degree; I perceived the key removed, and that the door was fall locked from the outfide!
 - "Convinced that Madame Veldentz had put her scheme in execution of going to Colditz, all my succeeding sears rushed into my imagination, I returned to the parlour quite disconfilate, till by chance a letter directed for me, in the hand of my governess, caught my attention; I seized it eagerly, and this was the distressing epistle."

So faying, Estella put a finali note into Sigismund's hand, who read as follows:

" TO ESTELLA.

"Peculiar circumstances constrain me to act in a manner insupportably distressing to my seelings! my dear Estella, I must leave you! you but too prophetically divined my desire for visiting Colditz this day! yes, my child, we must for the present separate; but I do not leave you friendless.

- " I have arranged a scheme for your suture life, which I hope will be productive of ease and comfort.
- "The Abbess of the Convent of St. Clare, is my relation; I have written to her this day concerning you; she will setch you from hence tomorrow morning, may she arrive in time to deliver you this letter and teach you resignation to its contents!
- "It is not now in my power to unravel the mystery of your birth, or disclose the reasons of my sudden desertion!
- "Never omit to wear your heart and chain; respect, and love the Abbess of St. Clare, and endeavour to conciliate her affection; she is already disposed to love you, and the unalterable fweetness of disposition you possess, will soon ripen that inclination into a real friendship!

"And now farewell, dearest Estella! I must not attempt to describe my feelings at this cruel necessity of leaving you; you know my tendermess and affection, and must believe the step deeply lacerates my bosom; and that the effort proceeds from duty, untainted by caprice! I dare not trust myself with another interview.

" May Heaven preferve you!

" AGATHA VELDENTZ."

"Judge what were my fensations after perusing that cruel billet! (cried Estella, as Sigismund ceased reading) my tears and lamentations, though confcious they were unavailing, were unceasing! till at length the idea struck me, that by haftening to Leipfic, I might vet be able to overtake Madame Veldentz, and by intreaty prevail upon her not to abandon me. The thought of being placed at the Convent of St. Clare was infupportable; and I determined at all hazards to escape from our little dwelling, that the Abbefs, who I supposed would very shortly arrive, might find her journey fruitlefs.

"The apprehension that I should scarce have sufficient time to effect my scheme, accelerated my motions, and by the help of table cloths fixed to the window, I escaped; and immerging into the forest, eagerly sought the road to Leipsic; but alas, ignorant of the different paths, I seemed every minute further from the spot I sought; and tired and satigued with being so many hours walking, without taking the least sufference, I should certainly have died with satigue, had not your generous kindness, gentlemen, relieved me!"

When Estella ceased speaking, both Isenburgh and Sigismund made her many acknowledgments for the confidence she had shewn them, and repeated their offers of service.

Estella thanked them with the greatest sweetness, but said she had already been sufficiently troublesome; that her only wish was to find Madame Veldentz, and that by going to Leipsic she did not doubt but that she should obtain her desire, as she could not but imagine her governess would remain there, till she should hear whether the Abbess of St. Clare had conveyed her to the Convent.

"Surely (cried Sigifmund) you cannot feriously wish to embark again in those troubles from which you so severely suffered yesterday! Pardon me, but though the conduct of Madame Veldentz is mysterious, yet it is very discernable, that she, from reslection, abandons you; and that, consequently, she will take every step to avoid you; indeed it is most probable she has quitted this part of the country."

- " Alas, (cried Estella) I must not remain here."
- "Why not? (interrupted Isenburgh eagerly), you are with those who, to the last moment of existence, will protect you; and in a spot where your smallest wishes shall be laws. Deign, then, charming Estella, to remain in a castle where you are sovereign, and relinquish the chimerical notion of seeking a woman, who must be unworthy of your tenderness, since she can resolve to abandon you."

Estella seemed much averse to this arrangement: Isenburgh made use of every argument to persuade her, and Sigismund also pleaded powerfully; yet their arguments were of no avail; and, though contrary to the opinion and wishes of both the gentlemen, they were obliged to coincide with her intention of going to Leipsic the following day, stipulating, however, that they should be permitted to accompany her.

Shortly after this point was fettled, Estella complained of a violent pain in her head, and seeming desirous of being left alone, Isenburgh and Sigismund withdrew.

CHAP. IV.

Already am I gone an age of paffion!

DRYDEN.

UPON quitting the apartment of Estella, Isenburgh and Sigismund repaired to the garden, and for some time they each seemed plunged in thought.

At length Ifenburgh, breaking filence, exclaimed:

- "I never could have supposed such a young creature as Estella could have been so inflexible! with what simmess she resisted our joint endeavours to persuade her to remain here!"
- "She has, doubtlefs, received a good education from that mysterious Madame Veldentz, (returned Sigifmund,) she seems so well acquainted with the rules of propriety."
- "She is the most angelic creature I ever beheld, (answered Isenburgh;) but Madame Veldentz might have employed herself more to the purpose than in filling her little head with prudifh notions."

"She is truly fascinating, (replied Sigisfmund,) and I think that sear of deviating from propriety renders her yet more so; (for what semale can be amiable who is not governed by those dictates!) I must consess, that the conduct of Estella, in determining, at all hazards, to seek her governess, interests me more forcibly than ever in her behalf."

Isenburgh turned his head on one fide to conceal a satyrical smile which escaped him at the last words of Sigisfmund, and the conversation took a different turn.

Shortly after they had dined, Isenburgh, with Sigismund, proposed again visiting Estella, when a servant entered to say, that the young lady was alarmingly indisposed. Shocked at this intelligence, they instantly hurried to her chamber, and sound her reclining upon a sofa, with every symptom of a high sever.

Ifenburgh inftantly dispatched a domestic for medical advice, and enforced particular orders to his semale servants to shew every assistance to the invalid, who was soon after put to bed, and Sigismund and Isenburgh remained in an adjacent room, eagerly expecting the apothecary, who, upon arriving, and seeing Estella, pronounced her illness to proceed from over fatigue, and ordered her to be kept quiet.

During fome days, Estella continued seriously ill; but a natural good constitution, aided by the assiduous attention she received, at the expiration of a fortnight, enabled her to quit her apartment; and, with returning health, her beauty seemed increased even to additional loveliness.

No fooner did health return to Estella, than she again expressed her hope of finding Madame Veldentz; and, with many expressions of gratitude for the favours she had received, fignified her intention of quitting the castle, and repairing to Leipsic.

Ifenburgh, (who already began to feel for Estella, what he denominated a violent passion), strongly opposed this intention; and, finding all his arguments inessectual, called upon Sigismund to second his intreaties.

Sigismund, however, to his surprize and vexation, professed his opinion, in many respects, to concur with Estella's; and proposed, that, at any rate, she should remain at the convent of St. Clare, while enquiries were made after Madame Veldentz.

In vain did Henburgh remind Estella of the repugnance she had expressed, when reciting her history, to the idea of residing in St. Clare convent, and that it was to avoid that she sted! Estella was immovable; and it was at last agreed, that Sigisfmund should carry a letter from her that night to the abbess, informing her what had happened since the departure of Madame Veldentz, and intreating to be received into the convent.

Sigifmund, therefore, shortly afterwards, rode to the convent of St. Clare, and delivered Estella's letter to the lady abbest; but what was his surprize and vexation, to find her resolutely bent upon denying admittance to poor Estella.

The flory of her illness she treated as a sable, invented to endeavour to palliate her fault, in remaining so long in the mansion of a young and gay man; and enumerating the mischiefs and injury it would do to the convent, to introduce a young person, whose character, at best, was equivocal, she positively resused even to see the object of her displeasure.

To the enquiries of Sigismund after Madame Veldentz, she declared her total ignorance concerning the motives of her flight, and refused to satisfy his curiosity in any particular whatever.

Finding all attempts to perfuade the abbess to admit, Estella into the convent ineffectual, Sigifmund withdrew, and returned to the caftle of Ifenburgh, much chagrined at the failure of his embaffy.

Upon enquiring for Ifenburgh, Sigifmund learned that a party of gentlemen had called, and that he had gone with them riding: not forry that he had an opportunity to converfe with Estella alone, he hastily slew to her apartment, and found her most cagerly expecting him.

Though it was with the utmost caution he acquainted her with the abbess's resolution not to receive her, and omitted the reslexion she had thrown upon her for becoming a guest in Isenburgh's castle, Estella was overwhelmed with grief at the information. Sigifmund had felt a growing affection for Estella even from the first moment he had beheld her: and the fight of her diffress increased his love with his commiseration. Unable to reprefs his feelings, he avowed the affection with which she had inspired him; and the manner in which she heard his declaration, convinced him he was not difagreeable. Their conversation became interesting; Estella expressed a hope that he would advise her how to act; at the same time faying, it was impossible for her to remain at Isenburgh's castle.

Sigismund heard that declaration with rapture; and, actuated more by love than discretion, entreated Estella to accept his hand, and, by that means, give him a natural right to protect her.

Estella heard this offer with much consussion, intermingled with gratitude. At length, recovering from her embarrassment, she faid, "she was consident his family would never consent to his espousing a poor friendless girl, destitute in every respect as she was; and that honour would not permit her to take advantage of the partiality with which he honoured her, to his own detriment."

Though the mention of his family reminded Sigismund of the authority of his father, and of the little probability that he would ever consent to his union with Effella, he yet continued to urge his request, when the sudden entrance of Isenburgh broke of their discourse.

Isenburgh appeared gloomy and discontented: Sigismund felt chagrined at his sudden intrusion; and Estella seemed lost in resection. The conversation was therefore spiritless, and ill supported on all sides; and, as soon as she possibly could, Estella withdrew for the night. After she had quitted the apartment, Sigismund related to Isenburgh the conversation he had with the abbess of St. Claip.

Ifenburgh liftened to the particulars with avidity, and it was evident to Sigifmund, that the refufal of the abbefs to receive Estella into the convent, gave him inward satisfaction. From many things that sell from Isenburgh during their conversation, it was very apparent that he was in love with Estella. Sigisfmund had suspected it to be the case shortly after she had been brought to the castle; but Isenburgh's manner that night rendered the matter not to be doubted.

Anxious to form a plan which might enable him to convey Estella from the castle with all possible dispatch, Sigismund pasted the whole night, after retiring to his chamber, in traversing the room, and creating new schemes in his imagination. To propose to marry her openly, was what he did not dare to do, being wholly dependant upon his father, (of whom he stood in great fear,) and scarce twenty years old. At length he resolved to send a note to Estella early in the morning, requesting she would meet him for half an hour in the park, that he might have an opportunity of finishing the conversation which Isenburgh had interrupted the preceding evening.

CHAP. V.

If you think I am too quickly won,
I'll frown and be perverse, and fly thee nay,
So thou with woo; but else, not for the world.
In truth, fair Sigismund, I am too fond;
And therefore thou mayest think my behaviour light,
But trust me, gentleman, I'll prove more true
Than those that have more cuaning to be strange.

SMARESPEAR.

UPON receiving Sigifmund's billet, Estella was greatly divided how to act, her inclination strongly prompted her to meet him in the park, according to his request, but the apprehension that by so doing she might render herself liable to censure, staggered her determination.

She already felt a growing attachment to Sigismund and an unconquerable dislike to Isenburgh, notwithstanding the marked attention and unbounded complainance of the latter.

Yet though the reloved never to form a clandestine union with Sigifmund; the yet thought that the most rigorous judge could not condemn, her for endeavouring to seeme the bright thip of a young man for apprently amiable, in her fortern situation. The latter reflection gaining strength upon her mind, she determined to meet him, and softly quitting her chamber, she with trembling steps entered the park.

It was fearcely eight o'clock in the morning. Isenburgh, who never breakfasted till a late hour, was not risen: but Sigismund had been in the park for: a confiderable time, and had nearly relinquithed the hopes of feeing Bitella, when the appeared walking down the avenue that led from the house. He eagerly sprang towards her, a and expressed, in the liveliest manner, bis rapture at beholding her. and "the pobligation the conferred in affording him an opportunity of difcourfing with her alone: and renewed the arguments he had made use of the preceding evening, to induce her to quit the castle of Isenburgh, and receive his saith at the altar.

Effella; though the would not attempt to conceal the preference the entertained for him; yet Arough refuled her affent to his proposal.

fhort, (added the) this been too hort, (added the) this wou to be enabled to judge of my disposition and character sufficiently to ascertain if I am calculated to make you happy, even if I was upon the equality with you in birth and to the equality with you imagine, that government without the authors of my balance and their rank in society, I could take advantage of your generality and affection, to:induce you to form an alliance with one who is, most probably, much beneath you?"

"Oh, top, for heaven's fake, my dearest Estella! (interrupted Sigismund,) can you suppose me so fordid and mean as to regard, such trifling considerations? Do more justice to my affection, and be raffured that no circumstances could change that regard which is fixed solely upon yourself."

"Ah, (cried Estella,) though such may be your generous sentiments, yet remember you have parents and friends, who, doubtless expect you to form a biilliant connection."

I have not much hope that in ther would at prefent confent to our union; but, would you but agree to a private marriage, my mother, (who is one of the most amiable women in existence) should be entrusted with the lecret, and, through her intercession, father would, in a short time, I not, be induced to forgie what ont be undone.

"Indeed, Sigifmulid, (replied Extella,) I would not, upon any confideration, be accellary to your committing fach an act of difformatice.
Fillal duty, in every trate of life, ought be implied; so not; there fore, urge me to the forest order, you inevitably to break what I confider as one of the first duties: but allow me to bespeak your friendship and assistance upon another subject: I shall not be happy till I have quitted this castle. Since by my indiscretion I have forfeited the introduction of Madame Veldentz to the convent of St. Clare, may I folicit you to endeayour to procure me a fituation in any other convent that is adjacent. I have a final fum of money, (contipued fice taking a little filver purfe from her pocket,) which I conclude Madame Veldentz placed in my pocket whilf was after the night preceding ber einel departure; and this I hope will be fufficient to defray my expences for the prefent."

to the convent of St. Agnes, (cried Sigismund eagerly;) a relation of mine was educated there; and, as the abbess is personally acquainted with me, I think it is most probable that I shall there be able to procure for you the situation you defire; and when you shall be settled agreeably to your wishes, I will, if you will permit, make your history known to my mother, who, I am assured, will be most happy to afford you protection."

"My generous friend, (cried Eftella,) to be known a year mather, and to gain her projection, would, to me, be a happiness that language is too weak to express!" And may I hope, (added Sigifmund,) that you will authorize the fentiments that I have ventured to declare?"

Essella blashed, and looked timidly upon Sigismund; she said nothing, but her silence was expressive: and Sigismund, whilst he pressed her hand to his lips, set his heart delight with transport, assured that the object of his love selt a reciprocal affection.

Ma, chi di paventare in alta impreta, S'avvien, di inni l'affider e di non pinere. Amor, che non catena il cielo unifice.

TA110.

AFTER quitting Effeth, Sigiffound mounted his home and haftened to Leipfig. At the chartenit of St. Agnes, he found the abboth perfectly willing to receive Effella as a hourder. He rentured to describe her as his own coufin, thinking, that by faying the was related to fuch a respectable family as Mansfeldt, he should ensure her being regarded with respect.

After fettling the necessary preliminaries respecting the admittance of Estella to the convent, Sigismund took leave of the alibest delighted that he had obtained infination for her, which would remove her from Isenburgh, whose attentions he began to view with the eyes of jealousy.

Upon arriving at the castle, Sigismund found lienburgh in the apartment of Estella, in earnest conversation, and wishly much interested in the subject of his discourse. Estella no sooner perceived Sigismund, than, turning towards him, she exclaimed:

- " My best friend! have you been successful? is there yet an asylum lest me?"
- "At the convent of St. Agnes, (answered Sigismund,) I have procured for you the temporary residence you require: the abbess is willing to receive you, whenever you are desirons of putting yourself under her protection."
- "Then I will go from hence tomorrow, (returned Effelia;) how much am I indebted to you for precuring me fuch a respectable situation!" "And, no doubt, (interrupted Isenburgh, who had sat in sullen silence from the entrance of Sigismund,) no doubt you are more indebted to him for enabling you to quit these hated walls, and to act without the advice and assistance of one, who, though most anxious to serve you, has yet inspired you with the most invincible dislike!"

"Oh, heavens! Count Isenburgh, (replied Estella,) can you really suppose me so superlatively ungrateful? Do me more justice, and, be affured I can never forget the favours you have bestowed upon me; but, it would be totally inconsistent with propriety, to remain in your castle, for obvious reasons; and, when I found in our last conversation upon this subject, that the generosity of your disposition rendered you averse to my seeking any other asylum, was it not natural I should accept the services of your friend, who, happily, entertained the same opinions as myself?"

Ifenburgh fighed, and was a few minutes without reply, at length he cried;

"But, Estella, promise me you will not leave us tomorrow. Surely such a trisling request you may grant without breaking through those fastidious rules of which you seem to stand in such awe."

- "I cannot comply, (answered Estella;) I am resolved to go to the convent early tomorrow morning."
- "With Sigismund for your guide?" (enquired Isenburgh sarcastically). "Most affuredly, (interrupted Sigismund hastily;) after my conversation with the abbess this morning, it will be absolutely proper I should place Estella under her protection."

Estella was embarrassed, and, turning to Isenburgh, she seemed preparing to address him, when darting an angry look he cried, "Though I have not the honour of your considence, though it is not me you select for the companion of your morning walks, you shall, notwithstanding, find me a friend. In spite of yourself, I will be serviceable to you; and when you shall have proved the sincerity of my disinterested esteem, you will, perhaps, arraign yourself of ill-sounded prejudice in your unjust and cruel aver-sion!"

With these words, Isenburgh abruptly quitted the room; and, hastening to his own, gave himself up to the contending passions of love, rage and jealousy.

The passion he entertained for Estella had daily gained increasing strength; and nothing had prevented him from avowing it to her, but the presence of Sigismund.

In him, he beheld, not only a rival, but a cenfor, whom he dreaded; confcious that his own intentions would not bear the scrutiny of a man of honour.

He had observed a softness in the manner of Estella towards Sigismund; and the tenor of her conduct shewed a preservence towards him, that filled the bosom of Isenburgh with resentment and jealous rage. The pleasure he used to feel in Sigismund's company was gone, dislike succeeded, and he eagerly wished the time to arrive when he should return to Mansfeldt. To anticipate that event, he determined to cause an anonymous letter to be written to Baron Mansfeldt, informing him, that his son had formed a dangerous connexion with an artful woman of intrigue, who was using every endeavour to seduce him into a clandestine marriage, and would most probably succeed, did not parental influence intersere, and summons him back to Mansfeldt."

When Sigismund should be removed, Isenburgh had no doubt but that his own plans would succeed. Marriage with Estella had never entered his ideas; though aware of the purity of Sigismund's sentiments, he had cautiously concealed his own from his observation; and, apprehensive of engendering suspicions in the breast of his friend, had repressed every mark of particular attention in his presence.

The intended removal of Estella to the convent of St. Agnes, angered, and disappointed him; and he determined to leave no stratagem untried to get her again into his power.

CHAP. VII.

Well, do not swear, altho' I joy in thee, I have no joy of this contract to night;
It is too rash, too unadvis'd, too sudden,
Too like the lightning which does cease to be Ere one can say it lightens.

THE following morning a fervant delivered a fealed billet to Estella; and at the same time informed her, that Count Isenburgh had quitted the castle at six o'clock that morning, but had left orders that his equipage flould be ready at what hour flue pleafed, to carry her according to her directions.

She opened the note, and read as follows:

" TO ESTELLA.

"I leave you, Estella, with the hope of being able to render you a signal service: what my design is, I will not now unfold; nor shall you again see me, unless I am able to essect that, which, if it promotes your felicity, may, in a mind like yours, induce you, in suture, to think savourably on

" ISENBURGH."

Estella shewed the note she had received to. Sigismund, immediately upon his entering the apartment. The mysterious stile in which it was written, occasioned them mutual surprize, nor could they form an idea of the design to which he alluded, unless he had formed the romantic notion of discovering the spot where Madame Veldentz had secreted herself.

After some time spent in useless conjecture, Estella expressed her wish to depart for the convent, and bidding sarewell to the castle of Isenburgh, sat out for Leipsic, accompanied by Sigismund, and attended by several domestics belonging to Isenburgh.

After introducing her to the abbefs as his coufin, and entreating her particular attention, Sigifmund befought Estella to give him five minutes conversation alone in the parlour, when, throwing himself at her seet, he exclaimed:

"In complying with your wishes, and placing you at this convent, think, Estella, of the happiness of which I deprive myself, accustomed for this last happy month to the extatic bliss of your society! how shall I exist, deprived of such selicity! Notwithstanding the sudden departure of Isenburgh, I mean to remain at his castle for some time, (most probably till his return;) promise me, then, dearest Estella, that you will allow me to see you every day. The relationship that the abbess believes to exist between us, will authorise that step; and, in time, may I venture to hope, you will give me a real and natural right to protect you?"

VOL. I.-E

Estella would not attempt to conceal the pleasure she should derive from Sigismund's visits; and the trouble they each felt when the hour of parting arrived, was greatly sostened by the reslection, that they should meet again on the following day.

During ten days, Sigismund regularly visited Estella at the convent; and, after each visit, sound his love and admiration increase; not a day passed but he discovered in her some new trait of sweetness of temper, good understanding, and a well-cultivated mind: hourly she became more dear to him, and hourly did his own influence become more powerful over her mind.

No intelligence arrived from Isenburgh; and his absence often gave rise to much assonishment, and many conjectures in the minds of Estella and Sigismund.

Upon returning to a late dinner at the castle, after having spent the morning with Estella, Sigismund was surprised and assisted to find a letter from his father, commanding his inflant return home, without affigning any reason for the peremptory command.

Sigifmund felt inconceivable reluctance to obey this mandate, but his father's orders were not to be disputed; he determined, therefore, to set off for Mansfeldt in two days; and in the mean while, to exert all his influence with Estella, to engage her to agree to a private marriage previous to his departure.

The following morning he repaired early to the convent of St. Agnes, and informing the abbess he had something of importance to communicate to Estella from his father, was permitted to fee her alone in the parlour.

The agitation of his manner immediately betrayed to Effelia, that fomething more than usual had happened; and she gently inquired, if any news had reached him from Count Isenburgh?

Sigifmund inflantly acquainted her with the real cause of his distress; and concluded, with conjuring her, in the strongest terms, to receive his faith at the altar. In vain did Estella repeat her determination never to accept his hand in a clandestine manner; in vain did she affure him of her conviction; that engagements formed without the concurrence and fanction of friends, were ultimately unhappy. Sigifmund's arguments feemed to derive fresh force from opposition; and seeking her hand, he solemnly survey to release it till the profifed to unite herself to him previous to his departure for Mans.

"Oh, Estella, (he added,) if you have no commiseration for my sufferings, at any rate have some pity for yourself. Call to mind your friendless, deserted state: yet recollect, that very state, though it ought to insure the good will and protection of the world, on the contrary, renders you more open to its malevolence! Circumstanced as we now are, the little services, that I may have been fo fortunate as to shew you, are liable to misrepresentation, and even to injure your reputation. Eager to fee you, and to enjoy the rapturous delight of your conversation, I have feized every moment that could afford me that happiness, without reflecting, that the malice of the envious and wicked, might put the worst conftructions upon our friendship. Let me, then, conjure you, dearest Estella, to receive my vows: I have prevailed upon a priest, upon whom I can depend, to perform the ceremony this evening. I shall become of age in fourteen months, till that period it will be very eafy to conceal our marriage; you can remain at this convent in the fame fituation as at prefent; and, my intimacy with Isenburgh, will naturally account for my being frequently in this neighbourhood; or, I can remove you to a monastery in the neighbourhood of Mansfeldt, which ever is most agreeable to you. Speak, then, dearest Estella, and pronounce my doom; you know not to what satal violence a rejection of my offers may thive me!"

Estella's tears fell sast during the whole of Sigismund's speech, in part convinced by his reasoning, and terrified at his vehemence. Her resolution gave way; and though she yet continued silent, Sigismund perceived, by her countenance, that his arguments would succeed; and, redoubling his prayers and intreaties, he at length extorted a promife from the fearful Estella, to join her sate to his that evening.

After having procured this promife, Sigifmund feemed to have attained the fummit of all happiness. In proportion, however, as he grew animated and chearful, Estella became grave and dejected; but even that appearance could not damp the spirits of the delighted Sigismund.

After fome time fpent in arranging their future plans, it was agreed, that Estella should leave the convent that night, under pretence of visiting a friend newly arrived at Leipsic: that Sigismund should meet her at the walls of the convent, and conduct her to the chapel, where the priest he had provided should be ready to unite them.

CHAP. VIII.

The priest in milk white vestments clad, Perform'd the mystic rate; Love, lit the hallow'd torch that led To Hymen's chaste delight.

MITER MANNAH MORE.

AT the appointed hour, Estella having fignified to the abbess, that a particular friend desired to see her that night, quitted the convent; and, full of sear and apprehension, hastened to the fpot where Sigismund was anxiously expecting to meet her.

The delight he manifested at their approaching union, insused a short-lived pleasure in her bosom, but it was a transitory sensation; and as they approached the chapel, her agitation was too powerful to escape the observation of Sigisf-mund.

"Dearest Estella, (he cried,) banish those sears which are so inconceivably distressing. Is not the happy man you thus honour with your choice, sensible of the distinction you are ready to confer upon him? Are you not going to form the selicity of one who loves you to adoration? And shall you not infure to yourfelf a fincere and faithful friend to whom your happiness is dearer than his own existence, and who can shelter you from those exist to which your unprotected innocence would expose you? Smile then, dear Estella, and let me hope, that this union, which readers me the happiest or mortals, does not increase the vexations of which you have to complain!"

"Dear Sigifmund! (replied Estella,) the step I am about to take so sully bespeaks my unbounded affection, that all protestation on that subject, would be superfluous: but, have I not cause to be displeased with my own conduct? Ought I to give way to that love that renders me thus implicit to your wishes? Ought I to consent to a marriage formed without the fanction of your parents? Am I not bringing unhappiness into a hitherto happy family, and rendering an obedient son refractory? Alas! I am but too sensible of the impropriety of my conduct, and surely that conviction heightens my fault! but my love for you, Sigismund, renders every other consideration puerile."

"Banish these ridiculous sears, my Estella! (cried Sigismund, eagerly interrupting her.) Pardon me, but they are devoid of all foundation: I shall take the earliest opportunity to inform my mother of our union; and, through her mediation, I have no doubt of obtaining my sather's forgiveness, and even approbation. Be re-affured, and think only of the happiness you are going to confer upon your faithful Sigismund!"

Their arrival at the chapel prevented further discourse.

The prieft, with another person, were already in expectation of their appearance; and Sigismund, leading his trembling bride to the altar, received those vows which he expected should render him the happiest of mankind.

As foon as the ceremony was performed, Sigifmund, after liberally rewarding the priest and affistant, required them to take the most solemn oaths of fecrefy, which, after having received, he, with Estella, quitted the chapel, and repaired to apartments not far distant; then taking Estella's hand, he cried,

" My dearest Estella, to induce you to agree to our union, upon which the whole happiness of my life depended, I made light of my apprehensions respecting my father's displeafure! Pardon the deceit, which I should never have put in practice, but from the uncertainty, that, unless you was deceived in that particular, you never would confent to be mine. I will no longer conceal from you, that I am inconceivably alarmed, left he should gain intelligence of this day's transaction, previous to my gaining my one and twentieth year; but it depends on you to remove my fears; give me but a folemn promise to conceal, even to deny, our marriage; and the precautions I have taken, render it impossible for it to be discovered, till it suits me to discovered, till it

Estella gently reproached Sigismund with having deceived her in such an important circumstance, but the promise of secrety she most chearfully gave; and bound herself, in the most facred manner, to conceal their marriage, till he should permit her to reveal it.

"But, indeed, Sigifmund, (she continued,) you had no cause to suppose I should wish to divulge it! to whom, but to Madame Veldentz, could you think I should defire to entrust it? And, alas, I have no prospect of again seeing her! she is, doubtless, very far distant from Leipsic!"

" It was of Isenburgh, (answered Sigifmund,) that I was apprehensive; he will, probably, return to his castle, before I am able to again quit Mansfeldt, (though I shall hasten to you with eager folicitude:) he will, then, doubtlefs, vifit you at this convent; and, notwithstanding the friendship that once did, and the intimacy that ftill fubfifts between us, I have many reasons for withholding all confidence from him. Was it not that my return to Mansfeldt was fo fuddenly commanded by my father, I would have fought a refidence for you in a convent, fome distance from hence; but that step is at present impossible: as to cause your removal from hence without the greatest fecrefy and circumfpection, would be at once hazarding the disclosure of what it is so necessary to conceal. I must carefully refrain from appearing much interested concerning you; and, however contrary to my wishes, allow you to remain at St. Agnes, till I can effect a scheme for removing you, without being, to appearance, concerned in your flight. If Isenburgh should return during my absence, see him but seldom, I entreat: and remember, always to fpeak of me with coolness and indifference. One reflection, that confoles me in fome meafure at being thus conftrained to quit you, is, that you cannot be removed from St. Agnes against your inclination."

CHAP. IX.

O lady, weep no more, left I give cause To be suspected of more tenderness Than doth become a man—I will remain The loyalest husband that did e'er plight troth.

SHAKSPEAR.

WHEN the hour fixed for Sigifmund's departure approached, Effella, who had till then, to the extent of her fortitude, repressed unavailing regrets, no longer could conceal her grief. Her tears fell fast upon the shoulder of Sigismund, who, nearly as much afflicted as herfelf, attempted to alleviate her diffress: in vain he bid her look forward to the happy days their re-union promifed! in vain he affired her, that no absence could diminish his inviolable love! Estella feemed incapable of confolation; and the exclamation of, "Oh, Sigismund, we part to meet no more!" was the only fentence she could articulate. Her grief fo entirely overcame Sigifmund, that, when a fervant entered to announce the horses being in waiting, he shrunk from the unwelcome tidings, and, after ordering the fervant to depart, declared he could not quit Leipsic that day, but would rather hazard his father's displeasure, and the discovery even of his marriage, than leave Estella in the distressing state into which the prospect of parting had thrown her.

However delighted Estella might seel for a sew minutes at the rapturous idea of Sigismund's protracting his stay at Leipsic, a short time convinced her of the risk and impropriety of indulging present happiness, to the destruction of suture selicity; and, assuming all the resolution she possessed, she entreated Sigismund to relinquish the idea her weakness had led him to adopt; and to persist in his original plan, and commence his journey to Mansseldt castle that day.

[&]quot;Whenever the diffreshing moment should arrive, dearest Sigismund, (she continued,) that should tear you from me, my forrow would be as poignant as at this moment! nay, it would be aggravated by the reflection, that I had induced you to act in opposition to your better judgment, and even rendered a disclosure of our union to be apprehended! Purfue, then, your first intentions; quit Leipsic today; I will inflantly return to St. Agnes, and foften the grief that overpowers my botom, by reflecting on your vows of constancy and love; and in nourishing the fweet hope, that you will feize eagerly the first moment to return to vour affectionate Estella."

After fome time fpent in tender argument upon this subject; Sigismund's wishes gave way to the reasoning of Estella; and, with mutual vows of everlasting affection, they took a sorrowful farewell. Sigismund mounting his horse, rode slowly from the hotel; and Estella, with mournful steps, repaired to the convent of St. Agnes.

CHAP. X.

Ben s'ode il ragionor, fi vede il volto, Ma dentro il pello mal guidicar punffi.

THREE days after the departure of Sigifmund, as Estella was sitting in an alcove belonging to the convent gardens, her thoughts solely fixed upon the that husband of her affections, and anticipating the moment that should bring her intelligence from him, she was suddenly informed, that a gentleman desired earnestly to speak with her in the parlour.

A momentary dawn of pleasure rushed over the mind of Estella, in the imagery, that Sigifmund had probably returned; but two moments reflection convinced her of the fallacy of her hopes; and the idea that Ifenburgh was returned, and was the perfon then expecting her, overwhelmed her with chagrin. From Sigifmund's manner in speaking of his friend, the least difcerning might perceive his mind was tinctured with jealoufy; to converse, therefore, in his absence, with Ifenburgh, was, to her, painful and diffreshing; vet; it was impossible she could refuse to see one to whom she was under so many obligations; but to prevent the frequency of Isenburgh's visits, she determined to tell him, that the abbess strongly objected to her. seeing gentlemen at the Convent, and that her situation was too precarious to admit of her acting contrary to the regulations of the house.

Upon entering the parlour where Isenburgh was fitting, in the Convent, the embarrassment of Estella was too powerful to permit her voice to welcome him. Her confusion was too evident to escape his penetrating eyes; but, appearing not to observe it, he expressed himself in general terms, happy to see her again, and to observe health so visible in her countenance; at the fame time apologizing for his hafty behaviour the last evening they had been together.

- "But (continued he) though I am very ready to admit-my conduct, that night scarce merits forgiveness, I am presumptuous enough to hope that when you know the success that has attended my abrupt departure, you will grant me that pardon I should not otherwise dare to solicit."
- "Indeed, Count Isenburgh (anfwered Estella) you do me injustice in supposing I have harboured the smallest referement towards you."
- ".Then you deign to forgive me, (interrupted Isenburgh), even before you know that fuccess has crowned my endeavours in your behalf. How grateful I ought to be, and how careful in future, to reftrain the natural impetuofity of my temper! but, before I begin an account of my adventures, allow me to ask, have you feen Sigifmund lately? Much to my furnrife and mortification, upon my arrival at home this morning, I found a letter from him to fignify, that a fummons from his father obliged his immediate return to Mansfeldt Caftle! Can you tell me when he quitted Isenburgh?'

At the mention of Sigismund's name, the deepest crimson shushed over the cheeks of Estella, and as suddenly gave way to the most ashy paleness, when the replied,

- " I think it is four or five days fince he called here to bid me farcwell."
- "The fociety of Sigifmund is fo inestimable to me (resumed Isenburgh), that I am always disconcerted at the privation; yet never, I think, did I seel his loss so severely, or so ardently desire his presence and advice as at this juncture.
- fine full conviction of finding him at the Castle; I will acknowledge, that I did not even think parental wishes would have influenced him to quit this neighbourhood in my absence, my surprise and disappointment were therefore equally great."

- "But, Count Isenburgh, (cried, Estella) you do not consider that you are all in its time exciting my curiosity, to know upon what subject that can regard me, you wished to consult your friend!"
- "I wished to prepare you. Estella, (returned Isenburgh) for a piece of intelligence, that, no doubt, will agitate you. Have you sufficient resolution to hear intelligence of an old friend?"
- "Oh! Count Isenburgh, (replied Estella, eagerly) for heaven's sake do not trifle with my feelings! you know my little history; you know I have but one friend; fay, then, 'quickly, have you, by good fortune, gained intelligence of Madame Veldentz?"

- "Compose yourself, Estella, or I will be silent for ever, (assured Isenburgh)."
 - "Oh! I am calm enough to hear every thing (returned Estella); do not torture me with suspense; 'tis your silence, alone, that agitates me."
- "Well, then, Estella, (replied Isenburgh) I have not only discovered the secret residence of Madame Veldentz, but I have seen and discoursed with her; it is only four days ago since I quitted her habitation!"

- Most generous of men, (cried Estella, falling at the sect of Isenburgh, in spite of his efforts to prevent her), words are inadequate to convey the seelings of my grateful heart! you elevate me above myself! what, shall I again see my dear governess; shall we never part again?"
- "Oh! Count Isenburgh, may your unprecedented generofity receive the abundant recompense from housen that it so richly deserves!"
- "You estimate too highly, that which proceeds from the most common seelings, (returned Henburgh, apparently confused at the warmth of Estelia's gratitude), every one, in circumstances like myself, must furely have acceding fimilar! But, Estella, I have a letter for you; yet your agitation is so excessive that I own I tremble to deliver it."

"Give it me, pray give it me, (hastily replied Estella); I am not agitated, I am quite composed."

Ifenburgh drew a letter from his pocket book, directed to Estella, and after announcing to her that the contents would not be thoroughly agreeable, and conjuring her to summons her resolution, delivered a letter into her hands, and she read as follows:

" TO ESTELLA.

" My dear child, hasten to me, let me embrace you and unfold the mystery of your birth, whilst I am able! what have I not suffered since I was over persuaded to abandon you! but the generous friend who has exerted himself in your behalf, will convey you to me, (Oh! that I was able to hasten with him to you), you shall then hear every mysterious part of my conduct explained.

" A. VELDENTZ."

Estella, upon finishing the above), let me fly to her instantly. Count Isena burgh, deign to direct me, you have assuredly promised as much to my poor governess, who, from her billet, is ill, perhaps dying! And unless I fly to her instantly, death will deprive me of receiving her last sighs! But, by what miracle did you discover her abode?"

" The most fedulous care would not, perhaps, have effected that discovery, had not chance aided my endeavours, (answered Isenburgh.) I travelled near a fortnight, making every possible enquiry, at every village and town that promifed a glimmering of fuccess: my efforts were fruitlefs, till one day, in passing the gates of an antique castle in a very remote situation, my horse starting at the sudden appearance of some poultry, threw me, and I remained, I know not how long, fenfelefs. Upon recovering my fenses, I found myself on a sofa, in a large and well-furnished room, and attended by two women, feemingly domestics; and from them learned. that, alarmed at my fituation when thrown from my horse, my attendants had rang at the bell, and requested assistance from the castle, which had been instantly given. Finding myself restored by the cordials they had administered, I prepared to depart, first begging to see the owner of the castie, that I might return the thanks I owed for my hospitable treatment. I was answered, that the lady of the castle was too ill to see any person; I therefore commissioned them to return my acknowledgments, begging at the same time to know the name of my benevolent entertainer; and judge my furprife, at hearing that of Madame Veldentz. The idea, that my hostes was probably the very Madame Veldentz that I was feeking, deprived me for some minutes of speech; but, recovering myself, I eagerly enquired of my informers, if Madame Veldentz was newly arrived at that fpot? They were filent, and looked at each other. I repeated my enquiries; they were yet filent: then tearing a leaf from my pocket-book, I wrote, " If Madame Veldentz withes to hear news of Estella, a person in the castle can give her interesting information." I entreated the fenior of my attendants to convey it to her mistress; she obeyed, and in a few minutes returned with a message from Madame Veldentz, entreating to see me instantly. I flew to her apartment, and found her in bed, supported by pillows, pale and emaciated! I briefly recounted to her my meeting with you, and its confequences? her agitation was really alarming, and, with many tears, she informed me, that the had been wretched fince the day when she had been. induced to equit you; that the bad flate of her health had alone prevented her from herfelf feeking vou; a violent fever having attacked her very fhortly after her departure from the forest, but that she had sent many persons in fruitless enquiries after you; and finished her speech, by most earneftly adjuring me to bring you to her with all speed, lest she should be furtched from this world before the could make the confession that hung upon her lips, and which was so effential to your happiness to learn! To render you more anxious to comply with her wishes, she wrote (though with great difficulty) the letter I have already delivered to you." "Oh, let me go to her this instant, (cried Estella,) I cannot rest till I have again beheld her!"

- "Do not go till you have confulted Sigismund, (replied Isenburgh;) might he not blame the precipitancy of your conduct?"
- "This is unkind, Count Isenburgh, (returned Estella,) all sarcasm, at a time like this, should be withheld; even if Sigismund had a right to controul my actions, would be blame me for hastening to my first sriend, in such circumstances?"

"Oh, pardon me, Estella, (answered Isenburgh,) I meant not to distress you. I will, this instant, order my travelling carriage, with a semale servant, to attend you, and we will quit Leipsic the moment you desire."

"This instant let me depart! (cried Estella,) I shall not enjoy a moment's ease till I commence the journey."

Isenburgh withdrew for a few minutes, to give necessary instructions to his servants; but presently returning, announced to Estella, his wish to write to Sigismund before their departure, to inform him of the intelligence they had gained concerning Madame Veldentz. Estella assented to his acquainting Sigismund with the tidings; but declared, that, upon no confideration could she permit him to put himfelf to the trouble of escorting her. "If you are so kind (added she) as to allow your carriage to convey me, it will be all that is necessary, and much more than I have any right to expect!"

"And can you really suppose me so negligent of you, Estella? (answered Isenburgh.) It is absolutely necessary that you have a proper guardian to conduct you so many leagues; and assuredly, as you are circumstanced, no one is so proper as myself. Do not, therefore, oppose me in this instance; however repugnant to my inclinations to act contrary to your wishes, I must be peremptory!"

Estella knew not what to reply. Isenburgh's manner seemed resolute and determined: she had no longer courage to oppose him; and the extatic pleasure which sancy pictured of beholding Madame Veldentz, rendered her almost indifferent to the means that led to that desired end; she was, therefore, silent, whilst the eyes of Isenburgh glistened with transport at the acquiescence.

The Count then feating himself at a table, signified his design of writing to his friend, and looking at Eftella, said,

- "Do you not think it would be highly gratifying to Sigismund, if you would condescend to send him a sew lines?"
- "Would it be necessary? (replied Estella with some hesitation.) Would there not be an impropriety—?"
 "An impropriety! (refumed Isenburgh,) you are really sastidious, Estella! but, seriously, it will be a satisfaction to me, if you will address a short letter to him."

Estella endeavoured to write, but the idea that Isenburgh would probably view the letter, involved her in so much embarrassment, that she sound herself unable to dictate a single line. She wished to write to Sigismund confidentially, but to do fo was impossible, whilst there was a probability that Isenburgh might behold her writing. Not knowing therefore how to act, she sat playing with the pen, and twisting the paper, till she perceived Isenburgh was folding up his own packet; and the found of a carriage, driving into the court yard of the convent, which she believed to be that that was to convey her from its walls, gave fresh force to her ideas, and she hastily wrote:

" TO SIGISMUND.

"Count Isenburgh has, no doubt, explained the motives of my conduct, which, might otherwise, subject me to reprehension. As circumstances are, you cannot blame me for accepting the fervices of that generous friend, and placing myfelf under his protection.

" ADIEU."

Estella had scarce sinished her own little billet, when Isenburgh put the letter he had just written into her hand, and begged her to read over the contents: it consisted of an account similar to what he had already given of his journey, and unexpected meeting with Madame Veldentz, of the determination of Estella instantly to sly to her governess; and concluded with many regrets at Sigismund's unexpected alsence.

The carriage being ready, Estella hastily took seave of the abbess, (to whom Isenburgh said, he had related that intelligence from a very dear friend, occasioned her abrupt departure;) and giving her hand to Isenburgh, was seated in the chaise, which drove with rapid velocity from the convent, and they were soon many miles distant from Leipsic.

CHAP. XI.

Effella! what arrangel hadd thou been,
If half thy outward graces had been plac'd
About the thoughts and counfels of thy heart!
But fare thee well, moft foul, moit that! farewell,
Thou pure impiety, and impious purity!
For thee I'll lock up all the gates of love,
And on my eyelids thall conjecture hang,
To turn all beauty into thoughts or harm.
And never thall it more be gracious.

SHARC. EAF.

AFTER travelling, with undefcribable celerity, on the evening of the fourth day from their quitting Leipfic.

VOL. I-G

Estella, with Isenburgh, arrived, at a large antique mansion, insulated by an extensive park.

As the approached the fpot where the expected to behold the friend of her juvenile years, the feelings of Eftella became even painfully violent; and, when the carriage stopped at the entrance to the castle, her sense entirely forfook her, and she was listed into a large, but Gothic hall, devoid of motion.

The domestic that had attended during their journey, assisted by Isenburgh, administered different aids to restore her to life, and in a short time their efforts succeeded; and the nest words she uttered were, "Where is Madame Veldentz? I conjure you, carry me to her inflantly!

"Pardon me, Estella, (cried Isenburgh,) but the interview must not take place to night; you are satigued and harassed by the length of your journey; and you already know Madame Valdentz is an invalid. To meet, therefore, now, might be highly prejudicial to both parties; and I cntreat you, if not for your sake, if you value the repose and health of Madame Veldentz, to desist from your intention of seeing her at prefent."

In vain Effella represented, that to see her would renovate the cofeebled spirits of her governess, and, at the same time, dissipate her own uneasiness.

Isenburgh was firm and obstinate; and, after trying every argument to effect her wish, Estella was at last confirmined to be satisfied with his promise, that he would himself conduct her to Madame Veldentz early on the following day.

Is infifted upon carrying Estella to the banquet hall, where a magnificent supper was prepared, but all his efforts to induce ber to partake of it were fruitless; and, after swallowing some weak wine and water, she entreated the attendants of Ulrique,

(the person who had accompanied her from Leipsic,) and begged to retire to her apartment.

She was conducted to a large and fuperbly furnished room, in which, to her great satisfaction, she found a small pallet bed for Ulrique, placed adjacent to the magnificent one designed for herself; and, after commending herself to the protection of Providence, (notwithstanding the anxiety of her mind to behold Madame Veldentz,) satigue so entirely overpowered her, that she soon such into sleep.

The following morning she did not awake, till Ulrique, in a soft tone, acquainted her, that Count Isenburgh had fent a message, to request her company to breakfast.

Eager to fee, in order to remind him of his affurance of conducting her to Madame. Veldentz, Estella sprung from the bed, and affifted by her attendant, was foon dreffed, when, precipitately quitting her apartment, she hurried to that in which she expected to find Isenburgh. Upon entering it, Isenburgh hastily arose, and conducting her to a feat adjoining to his own, at the breakfast table, addressed her in a strain of mingled gallantry and compliment, which both furprifed and vexed her.

To check a mode of beliaviour for diffressing to her feelings, Estella replied to him with the most frigid coolness; and, refusing the cup of chocolate he assiduously offered to her, defired to be that instant conducted to Madame Veldentz's chamber.

" I have fuffered myfelf foolifhly to be detained from feeing her too long, (she continued,) but no power shall prevent me from this instant slying to her!"

"Madame Veldentz cannot fee you to day, fair Estella," (returned Isenburgh, with provoking nonchalance.)

Estella, casting a look replete with indignation upon him, rose from her seat, and hastened towards the door: Ifenburgh fprung forwards, and rudely flopped her.

- "We part not thus, (he cried,) the time is now come when all fub-terfuge is unnecessary: we will now come to an explanation."
- "An explanation! (retorted Estella,) What explanation can be necessary? Let go my arm, Count Isenburgh; I will not be detained another instant!"
- "Nay, hear me." (replied Isenburgh, still holding her.)
- " I confider -myfelf in Madame Veldentz's house, (resumed Estella, haughtily,) and look upon myfelf empowered to difmifs from it, those who demean themselves with violence and incivility towards me. Leave me, therefore, this moment, Count Isenburgh, nor presume again to appear in my presence!"

"Upon my word, my charming Estella, (answered Isenburgh, laughing,) I never could have believed so much spirit inhabited that seeming gentle bosom! You have certainly a mind to charm me by thus displaying a new character! and your success is already confirmed in my heart. Variety is my idol; an eternal sameness palls the imagination; but the woman who is one moment dissolving in languishing foftness, and the next sparkling with lively passion, blends two such delightful extremes, that her empire over the soul must be alike; boundless, and sull of septure!"

"I am willing to believe, Count Isenburgh, (replied Estella, intimidated by the vehemence of his manner,) that I have misconstrued your intentions; and that what startled me for a few moments, simply arose from the vivacity of your disposition. Allow me, therefore, to seek Madame Veldentz, and, be assured, I will never remember what has just passed, but as the essuince of ill-judged pleasantry."

"There spoke the gentle Estella! (exclaimed Isenburgh,) but, at any rate, it is my interest and desire to receive pardon. Seriously, dearest Estella, I have been to blame in hurrying on my explanation too rapidly! but let the discovery be ever so important, when it rests with me to unfold, the tale must be delivered in a plain, and, perhaps, abrupt manner; for long presaces, and tedious digressions, are my soul's abhorrence."

"To the point then! It is impossible that you can have known me the length of time you have done, without perceiving the violent impression you have made upon my heart! Yes; I will repeat that which you already know so well: I love you with an unconquerable affection!"

Estella shuddered as Isenburgh pronounced these words; but, without seeming to observe her emotions, he continued:

"Distracted with jealousy to perceive the preference your heart gave Sigifmund, and aware of the return your love received from him, I determined, at all hazards, to separate you; for which purpose, I absented myself from my castle to give colour to my intended fcheme; gave the requifite orders for this manfion being prepared to receive you; fabricated the ridiculous flory of my finding your ancient governess, (whose hand writing I sound means to imitate, by fecreting the letter you shewed when related your flory,) and when the whole plot was laid, and the denoument alone wanting, transported myself to St. Agnes, and fecured my prize! And now, Eftella, when I remind you, that you are folely in my power, that Sigifmund believes that you voluntarily accepted my protection, it is furely fuperfluous to add, that regret and anger cannot possibly be of any fervice, but that both prudence and interest should instruct you to bestow that love I folicit. Over my heart and fortune you reign abfolute fovereign! Speak but what you would defire your fettlement to be, and I will even double your expectations! Myfelf and fortune are folely at your command; and the most assiduous love, will, I hope, in time, entitle me to a pre-eminent share in your affections."

Isenburgh would have proceeded, but the unhappy and deceived Estella, wrought up to a pitch of undescribable misery at the developement of the artifice that had entangled her in the net of her persecutor, sunk motionless upon the sofa. Alarmed at her situation, Isenburgh suriously rang the bell, and summoning Ulrique, and the principal part of his serale domestics, ordered them to convey the fainting Estella to her apartment, and to use every method to promote her recovery.

Placed upon her bed, and afforded every relief that could be offered, Estella speedily recovered that sensibility, of which horror and grief had deprived her.

Keenly alive to the frightful afpect of her destiny, her tears and lamentations, upon recovering her senses, were unceasing, and penetrated the hearts of her attendants with sympathy.

At the end of two hours, a meffage was delivered from Ifenburgh, requesting to see her. Estella, who had for a sew moments appeared more composed, upon hearing his intention of intruding upon her, burst into an increased agony of tears, and conjured her attendants, in the most pathetic manner, at any rate, to delay the intended visit.

Softened by her grief, the women informed Isenburgh, that she was really too ill to see him; and Isenburgh, half distracted at the intelligence, reiterated his commands of unremitting attention, intermingling his orders with wild threats and extravagant promises.

For four days Isenburgh was diffuaded from feeing Estella; but, on the fifth, his impatience over-leaping every other consideration, he sent her a peremptory message, signifying, that, unless she would deign to meet him in the breakfast parlour, he would, inflantly, forcibly obtain an audience in her dreffing-room.

Terrified and alarmed, Estella repaired to the breaksast parlour, where she sound Itenburgh traversing the apartment in apparent agitation.

"Oh, Count Isenburgh! (she exclaimed,) for pity's take be merciful towards me! Send me back to St. Agnes, I conjure you! The affection with which you condescend to honour me I never can return; then cease to persecute an unhappy creature, but'restore her to the asylum where her person was sheltered, and her woes alleviated." "This is not a season for nonsensical intreaty; (answered Isenburgh.) Is it natural that, after the hazards I have run upon your account, I should yield my prize before I have been allowed time fufficient to gain your affections? But this is not the subject upon which I wish' to discourse with you. I have this morning received letters from Sigifmund; he is dangeroufly ill; your elopement feems to have filled him with aftonishment; but here is a letter addressed to yourself. The contents, upon my honour, are unknown to me: perhaps, in that, he explains his feelings!"

At these words, Isenburgh prefented Estella with a letter, directed to her in the hand writing of Sigismund. Her agitation was for a sew minutes too violent to permit her to break the feal; and her grief, upon perufing the following fhort lines, was too agonizing to admit description,

" TO ESTELLA.

- "Upon first perusing the billet you had the effrontery to write, which confirmed the heart-rending reports already conveyed to me, in a transport of mental anguish, I resolved never again to see or remember you.
- "The first resolution I will religiously keep; the latter, I will, for this once, deviate from. To tell you, Estella, I renounce you eternally, that no penitence can obtain your pardon, but your infamous feducer shall yet find, I have an avenging arm to redress those wrongs with which he has eternally branded me.

" SIGISMUND MANSFELDT."

Oh, merciful Providence! (exclaimed Estella, wildly rising from her scat,) can nature bear this stroke! Is it not sufficient to be betrayed in the arts of salshood and treachery; must I, in addition, be cruelly upbraided? Let me go! Let me sly this instant! I will see Sigismund! I will convince him of my innocence! Then confine me; kill me if you please! I will not repine, or even murmur!"

" This is the wild rhapfody of unmeaning passion! (cried Isenburgh, forcibly leading her back to her feat.) Of what confequence to you is the opinion of Sigisfinund? You are not accountable to him for your actions; then why regard his puerile reproaches?

- "That Sigifmund loved you, I am not to learn: and, though I yet confider him as an infignificant rival, I glory in having torn you from him, and having fecured you even from his knowledge."
- "Ah, there you deceive yourself,, Count Henburgh; (returned Estella,) Sigismunds knows where I am; or, could be have sent me that distressing letter?"

- "Indeed, Estella, he does not! (replied Isenburgh, with apparent exultation,) Sigismund has yet to learn the place of our concealment."
- " Previous to quitting Leipfic, I dispatched to Mansfeldt a confidential fervant, with the letter you addressed to Sigitmund, from St. Agnes; at the fame time commissioning the man to announce, that you had accepted my offers, placed yourfelf under my protection, and fet off with me for Ariesheim; (which is above two hundred and fifty leagues from the spot where we are at prefent:) judge, then, how little Sigismund knows of your real fituation; and, believe me, that, even if he were sufficiently romantic to purfue us, months must elapse before he could accomplish his aim."

- "And what opinion do you expect me to entertain of you, Count Ifenburgh, when you daily unfold a fresh scene of wickedness and dissimulation? (enquired Estella, with all the firmness she could assume.) Even had you been esteemed by me, the development of so much treachery and artistice, would render you for ever despicable and odious to me!"
- "Women always pardon what cheir beauty occasions." (Replied Isenburgh carelessly.)
- " False, false affertion! (answered Estella, emphatically;) but, in the commencement of your discourse, you affirmed Sigismund to be ill: pray heaven that is not the case?"

"I repeat, he is dangerously ill, (cried Isenburgh.) My servant informed me the whole castle was in consusion upon his account; the mother in tears, the father sending expresses to all the doctors in the district. If you continue incredulous, I will call up Holstein, and you shall yourself interrogate him."

"Oh, no, no! (cried Estella, in undescribable agony,) the measure of my woes are now filled!"

Suffocated by her tears, further utterance was denied Estella; and Isenburgh, partly melted by her grief, reluctantly permitted her to retire to her own apartment.

VOL. I-H

CHAP XIL.

No time shall rafe thee from my memory; No, I will live to be thy monument: Ah, in my heart thou art interr'd; there, there, Thy dear resemblates leafer even Sx'd! My love, my long, my hadhand Sill, the' lost!

SONGREVE.

THE grief and agitation experienced by Estella, at the heart-rending resection, that Sigismund believed her unsatisful to the vows she had plighted, added to the frightful idea that she was friendless, and in the power of Isenburgh, was nearly too much for her already exhausted frame to support.

Upon repairing to her apartment, (though furrounded by the women placed to attend her by the order of Isenburgh,) her forrow and lamentation knew no bounds.

Throwing herfelf upon a couch, and covering her face with a hand terchief, the feetiled infentible of the prefence of her attendants, and alive only to the violence of her affliction.

"To Role the love of Sigismund, was, to lose the only bleffing that attached her to life! Sigifmund, dearer to her than existence, and whose very anger served but to heighten her affection, since air demonstrated the sincerity of his attachment!

Yet this believed object, upon the bed of fickness, believed her faithless and criminal stand her comel destiny seemed to sorbid any method of exculpating herself, and slying from the hateful tyranny of Isenburgh.

The continuance of her extreme grief feemed to fosten the before of Uhrique, (her principal waiting woman,) who endeavoured to meliorate her angush wounded to listen to the common condolings of pity, and, for fome hours, her tears were unabating, and the name of Sigifmund would involuntarily escape her lips, accompanied by the most pathetic lamentations, till a gleam of hope dawned over her mind, that, could she obtain the friendship of her attendant, she might, probably, through, her means, effect her escape from the power of Isenburgh.

Reanimated by this idea, Estella testified the most lively gratitude for the attentions of Ulrique, and fignified a visible preference in har favor; but after some time, when the endeavoured to prevail upon her to savor her slight, (representing the was unjustly detained, and had been seduced to the castle, by deceit and falfehood); the was grieved and disappointed to find Ulrique liftened coldly to her plandings, and finally to protest her duty to Count Isenburgh would not permit her to at in opposition to his will.

Notwithstanding the diffress their last interview had occasioned to Estella, Isenburgh, peristed in daily forcing himself into her presence; sometimes painting his passion in the most lively and softened colours, at others, endeady vouring to intimidate her by threats.

At the expiration of a week, as Effelia, bailied in tears, was contemplating the cruel letter me had received from Sigilmund, and offering up prayers to heaven, to afford her an opportunity of clearing herfelf to him, Ifenburgh abruptly, entered the apartment, and, feating himfelf by her, cried.

" I have just received unpleasant tidings; Estella, I shall expect you to join in my distress."

Estella raised her eyes from the paper she was reading, and fixed them, for a sew minutes, repreachfully upon Isenburgh, then sighing, again turned them upon the dear, though cruel letter.

Isenburgh continued. "I thought, Estella, you would not have been thus indifferent to what selected to poor Sigismund?" "" Sigifmund to (eagerly exclaimed Estella), have you heard from Sigifmund?"

Isenburgh viewed her for some minutes in silence; the malignancy that beamed from his eyes, terrified and confounded her; for some time they both remained silent; at length Isenburgh said.

interest you so candidly profess for my poor friend, renders me apprehensive that the sad event I have to unfold may overpower your sender settlings."

"Oh! mentiful powers, (cried Eftells), what have you to announce?"

"I cam really) very condition concerned, (replied Isenburgh) and syour agitation adds to my trouble. Poor Sigifmund"—

"Is dead! (stiricked Estella; in almost breathless agony); your words, your looks, every thing confirmate!"

"Tis too true, '(answered Henburgh); I have lost the beloved companion of my childhood, the valued triend of my riper years."

The grief and diffress of Estella at this rafficting intelligence, nearly amounted to distraction. The presence, of Henbergh was incompanied the leder to the agony of the feelings and uttered every thing despair sould distate.

Far from softened by her diffress; Isenburgh observed her with gloomy, anger, and it was not till her pallid cheek, and half closed eyes, seemed to declare the was near fainting, that he summoned the assistance of her women, and to their charge configned her, with the strictest injunctions that she should receive every care and attention.

During feveral days that a violent fever feemed to threaten, ultimately, the life of Effelia, In the life of the l momentarily smade enquiries concerning her, and every instant uttered fresh directions for procuring an increase of medical advice.

On the fifth day of her illness, the principal physician, who attended, delivered it as his opinion, that her complaint approached the crisis, and that her thrength would fail, at the important moment.

Distracted at the information, Isenburgh wildly exclaimed.

"Save her life, and command my seguine! 'Tis I, alone, that am her musilerers Oh, merciful Providence, this is too much to be endured!", And, in fpite of every effort to detain him, he rushed into the apartment of Estella.

A profound filence reigned; he approached the bed; Estella lay entranced in a deep sleep; the carnation of her cheeks was sled; a lily paleness spread over her countenance, yet was her beauty as eminently conspicuous as at the first moment he had beheld her!

Sorrow and compunction overwhelmed him, and, kneeling by her bed fide, he folemnly vowed, if her life was spared, to explate the wrongs he had designed, by an honourable martiage.

When forced from the fick chamber, the distress of Henburgh feeined to derive increasing strength: he at fome moments, soothed the physicians, and promised, that could they restore Estella, their rewards should be boundless; at others, threatened them with the most rigorous punishment in case of her dissolution.

The natural good conflictation Eftella possession, once more befriended her; and, contrary to the expectation of her attendants, her, illness took a studden and savourable turn

The joy of Isenburgh upon her convelescence, was as frantic, as his despair during her danger had been vehement; and her medical attendants, as well as nurses, were laden with acknowledgments, both pecuniary and personal.

What envious fireaks

Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day

I must be gone—

THOUGH health was restored to Estella, she continued a prey to the most tormenting disquietude; grief, for the loss of Sigismund, preyed upon her mind, and the honourable intentions that Isenburgh avowed, filled her with chagrin and terror.

Had she never known Sigismund, her sentiments and disposition were so opposite to those of Isenburgh, that it would have been impossible for her voluntarily to have consented to a union, notwithstanding his rank and fortune.

What then were her fensations, whilst idolizing the memory of her husband, and resolutely determining never to enter into a second engagement; upon reslecting that she was in the power of a violent and overbearing man, the slave of his passions, who imagined, that, in offering marriage, he extenuated every previous cause of offence; and whose proposals, though she resolved never to accept, she yet trembled at the consequences of resusing.

To fly from the castle, and place herself under the protection of the Baroness Mansseldt, was the summit of her defires. Sigifmund had always painted his mother in fuch amiable colours, that, though unknown, she experienced for her an undefcribable love and veneration: yet the remembrance of the folemn promise with which the had bound herfelf to Sigifmund, never to disclose their union, precluded every idea of claiming her protection, any otherwise, than as a friendless and unprotected semale; but the character she had heard of the Baroness for benevolence and goodness, induced her to hope she should not solicit in vain.

The idea was, doubtless, romantic; but Estella was very young, inexperienced and friendless; and, at the smallest shadow of hope, she eagerly grasped.

But to effect an escape from the power of Isenburgh, seemed almost impracticable. She was constantly watched throughout the day-time, and at night, Ulrique slept in her chamber, yet difficulty could not banish the idea from her mind; and whilst, to lull the suspicions of Isenburgh and his domestics, she appeared more calm and refigned than fince her refidence at the castle, she was revolving fresh schemes to escape from it for ever.

Henburgh, in the mean while, endeavoured to diffipate the vifible melancholy of Estella, by unremitting attention, and to engage her affection by the most artful and infinuating conduct; but though apprehensive of irritating him, the attempted to conceal the aversion he had inspired; in spite of her efforts, her dislike was so apparent, it was frequently difficult to him to refrain from giving vent to his anger, and reproaching her with the coldness with which she listened to his protestations of affection.

Estella had sufficiently recovered from her illness to walk in the air. Attended by Ulrique, and another semale servant, she had taken a long walk in the extensive gardens belonging to the castle, (the losty walls and iron gates of which seemed to extinguish every hope she had cherished of escaping,) when Isenburgh suddenly appeared before her.

Exercise had restored the roses to her cheeks that illness had dissipated, and never had she appeared so lovely in the eyes of Isenburgh, as at that instant. He ordered the women to retire, and then softening his manner, addressed Estella, informing her, with many expressions of tenderness, that the priest was arrived, and that he flattered himself, as her health was so visibly restored, she would consent to their union taking place that evening, or the following morning.

Estella turned pale. "It cannot be this evening; (she faultering said,) it is impossible!"

"Tomorrow, then, dearest Estella, (returned Isenburgh,) and we will then quit this spot, and visit some of my distant estates. Travelling will be serviceable to your health."

Estella derived courage from the mildness she perceived in Isenburgh's manner.

"Count Isenburgh, (she exclaimed,) I cannot permit you to nourish the idea, that I can ever unite my destiny to yours! By desiring it, you do me infinite honour, and I am grateful for your intentions; but obstacles, that never can be removed, oppose such a marriage; and, be assured, you have now heard my final resolution!"

Is displeasure at this declaration: he demanded to know the reasons that actuated her result; and made use of every possible argument to induce her to comply with his proposals, or to disclose the cause of their rejection. Estella was immovable; and the anger and disappointment of Henburgh encreased.

"Tomorrow, (he added, veheinently,) the chapel will be prepared for our maptials, and the priest in readiness to hear our vows; dispose yourself, therefore, Estelia, to meet me at the altar, and become my wise by inclination. The offer never shall be again repeated: if, therefore, it is not willingly accepted, compulsion shall make you my mistress. You now know the alternative; decide as you think proper, but I will no longer be trifled with !"

With these words, Henburgh quitted Estella; and, terrified and confounded, she was reconducted to her apartment.

The remaining part of the day was passed by Estella in endeavouring to escape from the detested power of Isenburgh, previous to the time he had appointed for their nuptials.

She traversed the long suite of rooms appropriated for her use, and again examined, if the thick bars of iron which Isenburgh had taken the precaution to fix on the outside of the windows, could be removed by an effort of violence. They resisted all her attempts; and, searful she might be observed making the endeavour, she returned to the room in which the had left Ulrique and Gertrude.

Upon entering the apartment, the found them unpacking some large trunks, and taking from them some rich, and elegantly fancied dresses.

- "Observe, my dear lady, (cried Ulrique,) what beautiful cloaths Count Isenburgh has ordered for you! They are but this instant arrived; he wished to surprise you!"
- "They are very handsome, (returned Estella, coldly,) but they are not for me."
- "Oh, yes, indeed, my lady, but they are all for you; (answered Ul-rique,) which will you please to select for tomorrow? This, white and silver, would, I think, become you, and be very suitable."

Estella shook her head, and was filent; in the mean time, her attendants, delighted at viewing the splendid attire, continued taking the different dresses from the chests, and spreading them upon the chairs and softs.

"Well, now, (continued Ulrique,) this is furprifing! If here is not an entire mourning robe! Who could have supposed that any one could be so ridiculous to mingle black with bridal finery!"

Effella, from the time the had heard the afflicting intelligence of Sigifmund's death, had ardently defired to thew her respect for his memory by wearing mourning; but, circumstanced as she then was, to obtain a black drefs, was impossible, and she had had no other means of evincing her inclination, than by refraining from wearing colours, and girding a black ribbon round her waist; the fight, therefore, of the black robe, renewed all her wishes, and even determined her to overcome her scruples of accepting a prefent from Henburgh; and, much to the assonishment of Ulrique and Gertrude, she desired them to prepare that robe for her wearing the following morning.

Night came, but brought with it no hopes of flying from Isenburgh. Estella went mournfully to bed; sleepwas a ffranger to her eve-lids; her anxiety increased with every succeeding hour which the great clock belonging to the castle announced.

At length morning dawned, and the clock tolled five! Estella started from her bed: one great effort was necessary; if she failed, could she be more wretched than at that period? If the thould fucceed!-

The probability of fuccess reanimated her courage: she foftly opened the curtains of the bed in which Ulrique slept, and perceived ber in a profound fleep. Cautioufly closing them, the commenced dreffing herfelf with trepidation. The box, containing the mourning robe was in the hamber. Estella could not resist the temptation, but, opening the lid, took out the drefs, and hastily wrapped herfelf in its drapery.

A large pelife belonging to Ulrique being near the bottom of her bed, with a projecting bonnet, made in the manner of the country people, flruck Estella's eyes, and the idea slashed across her imagination, that enveloped in them, (as her figure bore fome resemblance to that of her attendant,) she might escape detection, should she chance to meet any of the fervants of the castles.

Taking, therefore, her purfe, and dividing the little fum it contained, the put one half with the part of her wardrobe, too heavy to be removed by her own hands, and, with a pencil, directed them for Ulrique, as a compensation for taking her bonnet and petife; then haftily folding herfelf in the latter, and pulling the bonnet completely over her face, she took the small bundle of her cloaths that remained in her hand, and, with undescribable anxiety, made an effort to open the door of her chamber.

A weighty bar of iron was placed across the door, in addition to a strong double lock that fastened it. Estella cautiously removed the bar; though heavy, it produced no sound; but, when with trembling fingers she turned the key, which fecured the lock, it feemed to fnap with fuch violence, that her heart funk within her, and the remained a few minutes, motionless, with sear and terror.

Every thing, however, remained quiet in the apartment, and Estella, recovering her spirits, softly closed the door, and descended the great staircase. Though she walked with the lightness of a sylph, yet her soft steps re-echoed upon the large Gothic flairs upon which the trod: her fears encreased every instant; every found feemed to indicate purfuit; and, when arrived at the entrance of the hall, the was forced, for a few minutes, to grasp a pillar for support!

Distant voices convinced her the inferior servants had risen, and, upon gaining the outward hall, her jey was extreme, at perceiving the grand entrance door open!

She descended the stone steps that conducted into the park; and, with the utmost speed, walked down the avenue of oaks which opened into the high road.

At the extremity of the walk was placed a lodge, kept by a woman, formerly a fervant in the family, and, who now received a small pension from Isenburgh for the trouble of attending the gate.

Estella's apprehensions encreased as she approached that spot, but trusting to Ulrique's habit, and pulling her bonnet yet more over her face, the walked on with tolerable composure.

Two little children were playing near the gate. Upon feeing her advance, they ran into the lodge to fetch the key from their mother, and speedily returning, and unlocking the door, curtefied to Estella as she passed; the eldest saying,

- "Good morning, Mistress Ulrique; I suppose you are going to the fair?"
- "Yes, (answered Estella, scarce knowing what she uttered; and, at the same time, throwing some small money to the little enquirer and his brother.")

The children gratefully returned their innocent thanks; and Estella, quickening her pace, hurried down the road, every moment dreading and expecting pursuit.

In less than a quarter of an hour, her apprehensions increased, with hearing voices, and the found of wheels approaching! Her heart beat thick, and respiration nearly sailed her, when the cause of her alarm appeared in sight, and proved to be a small cart, full of men, women and children, in their holiday cloaths, singing, laughing, and talking. Her sears gave way upon perceiving them, and the driver of the cart addressed her as he approached, with,

"If you are going to the fair, young woman, I have just one feat to spare, and will carry you for a trifle?"

Estella joyfully accepted this proposal; and though she knew not to what fair they were going, or where she should be carried, willingly ascended the vehicles

The mirth and good humour which feemed to reign in the little circle, though she did not partake of, yet diffused a transitory pleasure over the mind of Estella, who gathered from their conversation, that the fair to which they were destined, was held at Mindleheim, and about two leagues from thence.

Her companions, too much occupied with the idea of the pleasure they should enjoy, to observe the confusion and embarrassiment of Estella, suffered her to remain silent and unnoticed; and after travelling about an hour and a half, which, to the agitated of Estella, seemed an age, the vehicle stopped at a small inn in the suburbs of the town of Mindleheim.

Estella, not knowing what step next to take, and whose mind was bewildered with anxiety, mechanically descended from the conveyance, and, after fatisfying the driver for his trouble, remained alone in the court-yard of the inn, her travelling companions having, with one accord, haftily repaired to the spot on which was held the fair.

The rattling of a carriage arouted her in some measure from her reverie; she retreated a few paces, and a coach, of general conveyance, drove up to the door, to take up paffengers.

An elderly woman, of prepofferling appearance, descended from the sleps of the inn door, and approached the coach, when, feeing Estella, and concluding from her drefs, and the bundle she held in her hand, that she was a fellow-traveller, addressed her with much civility. The coachman joining in the mistake, intreated Estella to follow the lady; and Estella, in whose mind the idea of flying from Isenburgh was alone predominant, waited not for a fecond invitation: and, without knowing to what foot the coach was deflined, or confidering any thing but that the might probably baffle the purfuit she judged would be made after her, placed herfelf in the coach, which immediately fet forwards, with a velocity nearly equal to her wishes; and she was, in a few hours, many leagues diftant from Mindleheim

HOOLE'S TASSO.

THE fecond evening after their departure from Mindleheim, Estella, with Mrs. Steinfort, arrived at Pilsen. Mrs. Steinfort desired to be conveyed directly to the castle of Stralzi, adding, that her presence must be much required there, as the Marquis and Marchioness Rosenhaim were either arrived, or hourly expected, and consequently the castle would be full of guests.

Estella's heart sunk within her as they approached the splendid mansion of Stralzi; and looking at Mrs. Steinfort with eyes swimming in tears, said:

" I ought to thank you for your many attentions, Madam, before we feparate. Alas! what will now become of me!"

Tears impeded further utterance. Mrs. Steinfort regarded her a few minutes in filence; then, taking her hand, faid; "I cannot endure the thoughts of leaving fo young a woman unprolected. Will you place yourfelf under my care for this night? I can infure you, for that period, an afylum in the caftle: in the morning, I will mention your hiflory to the Baroness; and, if you have related the truth, I think, I may venture to promise you her protection."

The joy and gratitude of Estella at the kind offer of Mrs. Steinfort, was perfectly without bounds; and she entered the castle of Stralzi in a state of happiness she had not experienced for many months.

The following morning, agreeably to her promife, Mrs. Steinfort acquainted the Baroness with the singular chance of her meeting with Estella; of the favourable opinion she had inspired her with; and of the liberty she had taken, in bringing her for one night to the castle.

After hearing Mrs. Steinfort's recital, which the good woman rendered very minute, by enlarging upon the most trifling circumstances, the Baroness declaring she felt an uncommon prepossession in her favour, defired Mrs. Steinfort to conduct her to her apartment, a command Mrs. Steinfort obeyed with alacrity.

Effella, though delighted at the furnions, yet felt much embarraffed at the idea of prefenting herfelf to the Baroness, but resolved; if interrogated, to relate every occurrence of her life, the event of her marriage alone excepted; and that important circumstance, she held herfelf not at liberty to divulge, in consequence of the facred promise she had given to Sigismund to conceal it.

Notwithstanding the encouraging affurances of Mrs. Steinfort, that Barones's Stralzi selt much disposed in her favour, Estella's agitation was so excessive upon entering the apartment of the Barones's, that her trembling limbs almost resulted to support her. Mrs. Steinfort, as soon as she had presented her to the Lady, withdrew; and Estella, finking at the feet of the Baroness, pathetically entreated her pity and protection.

The Baroness, though prepared by Mis. Steinfort for the appearance of vouth and extreme beauty, was yet dazzled by the bewitching loveliness of Etlella, whom, raising from the ground, and placing on the sofa by her side, the encouraged by the most affable behaviour, and promised, if the needed any office of friendship, to betriend her to the extent of her power.

The interesting and innocent manner in which Estella uttered the gratitude of her heart, encreased the prepossession and admiration of the Batonet. Eftella was endowed by nature with the most engaging address, and captivating manner; and, as these qualities were the gifts of nature, unaffished by art, so they seldom failed of interesting those she addressed in her savour.

The Baroness, after some conversation, in which the suavity of her behaviour in some measure diminished the distidence of her juvenile companion, expressed a wish to know by what singular circumstance so young a creature should be thrown destitute and triendless on the world?

"For (added she) Mrs. Steinfort informs me, you have told her, that you have not a single friend in existence?"

Effella, with tears, repeated the melancholy affurance; and, agreeable to the refolution she had formed, signified to the Baroness, that, if it would not be intruding too much upon her time, she would relate the incidents of her life.

The Baroness testified an eager desire to hear her narrative; and, after a short time, Estella faithfully related every circumstance of her early life; the singular manner in which Madame Veldentz kept her secluded in the forest near Colditz, and of the unaccountable departure of her governess; not concealing the letter which informed her, that the Abbets of St. Clare was prepared to receive her: her slight from their cottage to escape the Abbess, with the chimerical hope of overtaking Madame Veldentz."

When Estella approached that part of her history that related to her first seeing Sigismund, grief at his remembrance, and confusion at the idea that she must suppress the circumstances of her life that related to him, almost overpowered her, and articulation was, for a few moments, suspended.

The Baroness, who solely imputed her disorder to consussion at the recollection of her disobedience to the injunctions of her governess, endeavoured to comfort her; and Estella, with some difficulty, proceeded to relate her meeting with Count Isenburgh in the forest; of his conveying her to his castle near Colditz, and her illness and confinement there; of her application to the Abbess of St. Clare, and distress at being resused admittance to the convent: and her then gaining an afylum in that of St. Agnes.

She then proceeded to relate the artifice by which Isenburgh had enfurred her from the convent; and of his subsequent conduct whilst in his power, at his castle, near Mindleheim; and concluded, with an exact detail of her fortunate cscape, and still more fortunate meeting with Mrs. Steinfort, which had been the means of introducing her to the Baroness Stralzi fufferings, and foftened by her apparent candour, thanked her for the confidence she had reposed, and promisifed to render her every service in her power; at the same time she could not sorbear from pointing out to Estella, that her distresses had arisen from her own simprudence; and that, from disobedience to the injunctions of Madame Veldentz, her subsequent missortunes solely originated!

When Estella had concluded her story, the Baroness, *affected by her

"To be deprived in fo fudden and extraordinary a manner of your protectiefs, (added the Baronefs,) was a heavy affliction, and required the exertion of all your fortitude; but, from your knowledge of the character of your friend, you ought to have been convinced that her reasons for quitting you were not to be controverted; and that, even could you have overtaken her in her flight, you would have only added to her diffrefs: and, after all, the feparation must have taken place.

" If Madame Veldentz acted from good principles, the would have been firm; if, from bad ones, you would, depend upon it, have found her implacable! I do not mean to diffress you; but are you aware of all the confequences attendant upon the rejection of the Abbefs of St. Clare to receive you in the convent?"

" My conduct admits of no extenuation." (Returned Effella, weeping.)

"Yes; your youth and inexperience are, in some measure, palliatives; and you have even suffered beyond your indifcretion, (replied the Baronefs;) but, it appears from your story, that the idea has never occurred to you, that it is alone in the convent of St. Clare, that you can ever hope to hear intelligence of Madame Veldentz; for, as the fuppofes you in that retirement, if, at any future period she is induced to feek you, will not that naturally be the place of her enquiry?"

"The reflection has too often wounded me, Madam, (answered Estella;) though I must own I am hopeless, as to her ever attempting to feek me! But what can I do? The Abbefs, prejudiced against me, has refused me admittance; and what shall I gain by fresh application, but a contumelious resusal! Nevertheless, if it is your Ladyship's advice, I will make the attempt?"

"I would advise, that, at any rate you make enquiries respecting your friend, (replied the Baroness,) who, it is possible, though not very probable, may have written to you at the convent."

" I dare not hope for fuch good fortune! (exclaimed Estella;) yet, depend upon it, my Lady, I will follow your advice."

"Then write to the Abbefs, in the course of a few days, (rejoined the Baroness;) inform her, that you are, at present, under my protection; and, so far from desiring your admittance into the convent, I do not intend to part with you; but request to hear any intelligence she may have to communicate respecting Madame Veldentz. I will also write to her, and inclose your letter in my packet."

Estella expressed her gratitude and thanks for the kindness of the Baroness, in the most affecting manner; and felt so powerfully, the force of her goodness, that the most painful regret overwhelmed her at having been forced to act with duplicity, towards, to apparently, an amiable woman; and, while feemingly disclosing the whole of her history, concealing such a principal event as her marriage!

She felt most feverely, that one deviation from truth, introduces a repetition of falschoods; and deeply regretted, that, hurried on by passion, she had ever yielded consent to a clandestine union, which had necessitated her to promise such inviolable secrety; the memory of Sigismund was dearer to her than ever; and she reproached herself with having been the cause of such an affectionate son's disobedience to his parents; and painted, in her imagination, the distress and remorfe he must have endured upon his death bed, whilst receiving the tenderest parental attentions, at the resection, that he had committed an action he dared not to avow!

As these afflicting images passed over the mind of Estella, her countenance imbibed the melancholy cast of her ideas, and appeared to affectingly forrowful, that the Baroness, who was attentively observing her, felt almost overpowered with pity and commiferation; and, taking her hand as she fat by her fide, affured her, in the kindest manner, of her future friendship: and Estella, smiling through her tears. endeavoured to throw afide the gloomy, and entertain more cheerful ideas.

The entrance of Baron Stralzi incorrupted their converfation; and, after having been introduced to him by the Baroness, as a young person of whom the had taken charge, Estella withdrew to her own apartment.

CHAP. XVI.

Then pilgrim turn, thy cares forego, All earth born cares are wrong: Man wants but little here below, Nor wants that little long.

COLDSMITH.

BARONESS Stralzi was naturally amiable and good-tempered; but romantic and credulous to an extreme. Married at a very early period to a man confiderably older, than herfelf, who indulged her in every inclination and caprice, she gave way, without scruple, to the predominant turn of her mind; and to be beautiful, interesting, and unfortunate, was a sure criterion to obtain her aid, sympathy and friendship.

Notwithstanding the innumerable deceptions that were practifed upon her, and the variety of disappointments she experienced, Baroness Stralzi persisted in cherishing the illusion, and allowing herself to be solely governed by the impulse of the moment, a failing that was particularly savourable to Estella, whose beautiful

The Baron, who faw with pain the ferious vexations that the sudden and violent friendships of his lady frequently produced, listened but coldly to the encomiums bestowed by her on Estella, after she had withdrawn; and could scarce forbear from hinting his doubts, as to the truth of her story, which appeared to him strange and improbable.

Complaifance, however, to the Baroness, constrained him to silence upon that subject; and he contented himself with observing, that he hoped her new friend would not disappoint her expectations.

The Baron, though thus mistrustful of the innocent Estella, wanted neither goodness of heart, nor liberality of sentiment; he was, on the contrary, one of the worthiest and best of men; and, to his urbanity and philanthropy, the Baroness was greatly indebted for the high character given of her by Mrs. Steinfort; for, as she never opposed any scheme of benevolence he might adopt, he, in return, generally bestowed upon her the merit of the action.

Very contrary to the wishes of Estella, Baroness Stralzi, to evince her regard, infisted upon her joining the family at dinner.

Upon entering the dining hall, fire found, befides the Baron, (to whom she had been presented in the morning,) his youngest son, Lord Palamede, and the Marquis and Marchioness Rosenhaim.

Lord Palamede, in whose praise Mrs. Steinfort had been so lavish, fully equalled the description given him as to external appearance, and seemed sensible and agreeable in his manners.

The Marquis Rosenhaim had an austerity in his countenance, and hauteur in his conversation, that inspired Estella with a degree of awe that was even painful; but, whatever disagreeable sensations she might seel when addressed by him, the mild affability of the Marchioness more than recompensed.

This charming woman appeared to Estella, not to be more than four or five and thirty years old; but, from some conversation that took place betwixt her and the Baroness, she afterwards concluded to be some years older.

She was tall, graceful, and beautifully formed; and so captivating in her manner, that Estella, from the moment she beheld her, selt eager to obtain her notice and regard.

In confidering her countenance, it struck Estella as bearing a strong affinity to some one she had seen before; but to whom she could not recollect.

The Marchioness, though, in general, unlike the Baroness, in respect to sudden attachments, yet selt inconceivably charmed with Estella; and, though she bad, upon first hearing the history, there blamed the Baroness's credulity; in taking the young creature under her protection before the had written to the Abbess of the convent of St. Clare, and made enquiries concerning her, after feeing and conversing with her, the found it impossible to condemn the predilection of the Baroness.

Notwithstanding the kind attentions of the Marchioness and Baroness, the politeness of Palamede, and the hospitality of the Baron, Estella selt constrained in a society so new to her, and eagerly embraced a hint given by the Baroness, that probably she had not recovered the satigue of her journey, to retire to her own apartment.

She had no fognet retired, than 1.5.

she became the general topic of con-

The Baroness was warm, even to enthusiasm in her praise! The Marchioness admired her artless manners, and the extreme modesty she possessed: the Baron exclaimed, " she was the prettiest girl he had ever seen;" and the Marquis said, " she would be a compleat beauty, had her sigure but more dignity."

But the person who was most filent on the subject, selt, perhaps, a warmer interest, and more lively curiosity, concern-Estella, than any one in company.

Palamede had not spoken a syllable from the time she had quitted the room, yet his thoughts were so fixed upon her, that he had scarce heard a sentence of the conversation that had passed..

Estella had not been many minutes in her chamber, when some gentle taps at the door preluded the appearance of Mrs. Steinsort.

"Well, my dear young Lady, (cried she upon entering the apartment,) I may now congratulate you upon having secured a sase and comfortable asylum! I assure you, I am rejoiced at your good fortune. And how do you like my Lady and the Baron? Are they not a worthy couple?"

Estella uttered every grateful expression her heart could dictate, to Mrs. Steinsort, for her introduction; and bestowed the warmest encomiums upon the Baron and Baroness, particularly upon the latter; and then enquired, if the Marquis and Marchioness Rosenhaim were related to the samily?

"Yes, (replied Mrs. Steinfort;) the Marchioness is my Lady's own fifter. Is the not a charming woman, Miss Estella? To look at her, who would suppose the had grown up children! Yet such is the fact. Her daughter was married a sew months ago to Count Altenburgh; and her son is at present travelling, and our Lord Friburgh is his companion. We expect them back in about two months time; and, till then, the Marquis and Marchioness will remain here."

- "The Marchioness is, indeed, a lovely woman, (returned Estella,) 'tis impossible to behold her without seeling both love and admiration!"
- "And the Countess, her daughter, is just such another sweet creature! (rejoined Mrs. Steinfort.) Oh, 'tis a charming family, Miss Estella, except the Marquis—but mum, for that! I do not love to rail, or else I could tell you a few anecdotes concerning him that would not encrease your good opinion!"

- "Why, it is an unpleasant task to dwell upon the failings of mankind!" (Answered Estella.)
- " It is indeed, Miss! (returned Mrs. Steinfort.) And therefore I do not love to speak concerning the Marquis."

Then enquiring of Estella, if she had every thing she defired; or, if he should send a semale servant to attend her; and being assured in reply, that she wanted no assistance, Mrs. Steinfort retired with many expressions of kindness and good will.

Estella, when left alone, found it impossible to close her eyes. The strange manner in which she had escaped the power of Isenburgh, and the slattering hope that she had secured powerful friends and protectors, overpowered her mind with joy.

Then the viciffitudes she had experienced during the last fix months of her life crowded upon her imagination; and lastly, the tender recollection of her beloved Sigismund, and the insupportable idea, that he died in the conviction of her sales-hood, tortured her with unspeakable anguish; and it was not till the approach of day-light that sleep settled upon her eye-lids, and lulled her to a temporary repose.
